There is No Place for Racism in SSPS

WPI-SSPS Faculty

WPI’s Social Science and Policy Studies Department (SSPS) is a team of scholars who are engaged in understanding complex global systems, their diversity and difference, and their ever-changing contexts. We go about our work with passion and quiet optimism in our search for solutions to the many global challenges our societies face. Yet, to understand the despair we have felt since the latest incidents of racial hatred we would have to travel back in time to the era of the Great Society which gave us hope that we could right past wrongs, like Jim Crow.

While we approach our work scientifically, recent events make us anything but disinterested observers. For many of us, there is no way to know the anger and anguish caused by decades of barely veiled institutionalized racism. We cannot fully know the pain and despair caused by the deaths of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor, Ahmaud Arbery, Sean Reed, and countless others. We also cannot fathom a lifetime of suffering from insidious and institutionalized injustice. We acknowledge that many of us have come to our privilege unfairly; we can be who we are without having our identity or intentions questioned because of the color of our skin.

To find our leaders culpable is fair, but they are not the only ones on whom we should cast our critical eye. We must look at ourselves and our political institutions. We must also examine our supply chains, our technology, and the way we do science. For example, studies by our colleagues at WPI show that air pollution is endemic in African American neighborhoods, which causes lung conditions, such as asthma. Rates of asthma are higher in urban black Americans than suburban white ones. We need to look no further than the death rate of the COVID pandemic to see how an ‘apolitical virus’ has been allowed to discriminate. According to the CDC, the death rates of Black Americans is 852 per 100,000 population against 725 per 100,000 in whites. Home ownership, environmental exposures, access to good food, are still other factors that compromise the health and well-being of our fellow Americans.

Educator Jane Elliott asked a room of white people: would you like to be treated as our black citizens are treated? All present confirmed that they would not like to be treated similarly. She then asks: “why are you willing to accept it for others?” We cannot accept it for others. A recent tweet by Ijeoma Oluo is especially prescient here: “The beauty of anti-racism is that you don’t have to pretend to be free of racism to be an anti-racist. Anti-racism is the commitment to fight racism wherever you find it, including in yourself. And it's the only way forward.”

In SSPS, we must commit to be anti-racist. That means standing up for what is right. It means seeking to confront our own biases and deliberately work to reduce them in our scholarship, our teaching, and our engagement with students, colleagues, and anyone we meet. It means hiring more people of color and giving their perspectives a platform, as we have our own, to permeate our courses, programs, and our teaching and learning.

We praise and thank the brave people from all around the world who have rallied against racism. If you don’t feel like you can attend a protest, you still have a contribution to make toward change. We urge you to find your own voice, your own form of engagement, and to push for change. This could be in your club, your sports team, or even taking cookies to a neighbor. It could also mean political engagement. Call out those elected officials who don’t act swiftly and appropriately to end racism. Work against their re-election. You could work with children. Model systems and identify stocks of racism and triggers that allow these reserves to flow out into society. Expose bias where it exists and work with friends, colleagues, policy makers – and with SSPS – to create change.

Racism has no place in our department. In SSPS, we will begin a review of our programs, policies, practices, and culture to work toward greater inclusivity and to be anti-racist. We will not tolerate intolerance in any form. Let’s shine our collective light on this moment, see it for what it is, and work to change it. The time for tearing each other down must be over; let’s tear down Jim Crow.

--The Social Science and Policy Studies Department Faculty and Staff

Resources:

https://www.shutdownstem.com/

https://greatergood.berkeley.edu/article/item/antiracist_resources_from_greater_good

https://libguides.nyit.edu/c.php?g=666045&p=4761364